- Defining Equitable Distribution Metrics for States. States are required by the federal government to identify the districts and schools in which teacher distribution is an issue. However, there is no clear consensus on how to identify the districts and schools in which assistance is needed. What constitutes a high-poverty, high-minority, low-performing school? When does a state consider its teachers equitably distributed? What are some theoretical and practical approaches to defining and measuring equitable distribution criteria?
- Working With Local Education Agencies to Collect and Analyze Data. How do states work with local education agencies to collect data about the distribution of teachers? Once states receive those data, how are they used to make decisions about the distribution of teachers? What are some examples and strategies from states and districts?
- Aligning State Needs With Action Strategies. How can states align the need for equitable distribution with strategies in an intentional way? How can states and RCCs create the will and organization to do the work?
